Hamlet: the Complete Works volume 1: the roving cannon and countermeasures.Q: PHP Outputting XML Element Values I have a very simple XML document (test.xml) and a simple PHP script (index.php) which calls a function within a class using DOM. When I run this script, I would like to output the values contained within the elements of test.xml, but I am not able to figure it out. The class is set up as follows: class test { public function __construct() { } public function testFunction() { $doc = new DOMDocument(); $doc->load('test.xml'); $e = $doc->getElementsByName('test'); foreach ($e as $node) { $text = $node->nodeValue; echo $text; } } } My XML document contains 3 separate elements, one of which is a test element with an id attribute. The function above does not pick these up. My question is: How can I get the output of these elements as well? A: If there is only one test element, you should be able to simply access the NodeValue: $test = $node->nodeValue; If you have multiple elements with the same name as in your example, then you will need to loop over them with a foreach loop and get their values using their names: $elements = $doc->getElementsByName('test'); foreach($elements as $node) { $value = $node->nodeValue; echo $value; } Oh hey guys! It's at least been about a week or so since I've made a comic post, but that's because I've been in my parent's basement recording a new song. And what song? I've tried to keep the identity of the song anonymous for 6d1f23a050
